

David Cox

Having gone to university in the 1990s, I remember a time when being open about your identity was far from easy. Conversations around gender, sexuality, and inclusion were often met with silence or misunderstanding, and I experienced first-hand how isolating that could be. Those moments, though painful at times, gave me perspective and resilience. They also inspired my lifelong commitment to ensuring that no one feels invisible, unwelcome, or unsafe for simply being themselves.

I want to stand for this role because I believe every LGBTQ+ student deserves to feel proud, supported, and celebrated. University should be a space where everyone can thrive—where diversity is not just acknowledged, but embraced as something that strengthens the entire community. I understand how easily people can feel disenfranchised, whether because of their sexuality, identity, or life circumstances, and I am determined to be a strong advocate for anyone who feels left out or unheard.

My approach is rooted in empathy, communication, and action. I have worked in environments where inclusion was more than a policy—it was a culture built through listening, collaboration, and persistence. I bring those same values here: to speak up for others, to ensure voices are heard at every level, and to help foster an atmosphere of respect and understanding across campus.

If elected, I would work tirelessly to promote equality, create safe and visible spaces for LGBTQ+ students, and ensure that support is accessible to all. My goal is simple: to make our university a place where everyone feels that they belong—not despite their differences, but because of them.

Ash Dawes

As a queer student myself I think I'd be suitable for this role, In my previous college I help spread awareness and plan event for people in similar situations. I'm open minded and I love to help no matter the situation!